

Opinion Writing

Structure and Cohesion
The writer is new to the writing workshop or this particular genre of writing. This writer may be writing a story or an informa- tion text and may not understand how or why to write opinions.	You are writing a story—it tells what happened to you first, next, next. You want to be the kind of writer who can write different kinds of things. Like if you were a jewelry shop, you'd be glad if you could make pretty pins, but you'd also want to know how to make other things, too. And you wouldn't want to start off making a necklace and it looks like a little dog with a pin on the back! Well, today, you sort of did that. You started out making not a necklace but some opinion writ- ing to change the world and you ended up making a story again. When you write opinion pieces, instead of telling a story, you tell peo- ple how you feel about things in the world—things you really like or things you want to change. Then you say, "This is what I think, and this is why."	Story: I did this, and then this (or She did this, then this). Opinion writing: I think this. Here's why! You should think this way too. Story Opinion
The writer dives into his piece without dis- cussing the topic or introducing what the piece is about. This writer tends to give his opinion and may give supports, examples, and/or reasons, in any order. There does not seem to be a clear beginning, an order to the information, or a closing.	Writers plan their books. They think about how they are going to organize their information. Writers think about each part, from the be- ginning to the end. One way that you can work on the introduction of your book is to tell your readers about your topic, your opinion, and why they should read your book!	Things to Include in an Introduction: <ul> <li>Your topic</li> <li>Your opinion</li> <li>Why?</li> </ul> Introduction Example: Opinion Why?

The writer's piece has ideas and informa- tion scattered throughout in a disorganized fashion.	Writers try to organize their information in their books. Writers talk about each part of their idea as much as they can before they go on to another part of their piece.	<ul><li> "One example is"</li><li> "Another reason"</li></ul>
This writer has many disconnected parts to her writing. She may have information and opinions throughout the piece, but it lacks organization as well as consistent transitions that will bring more organization and structure to the piece and help the reader follow what the writer is teaching.	One way that you can organize your information and connect the dif- ferent parts of your piece is to tell all about one piece of information. Then you can think to yourself, "Do I have another example?" Or you can say to yourself, "Also, another reason might be" This will help you not only connect your ideas, but it will also help you
Elaboration	say more.
The writer is struggling to elaborate.	You know that when you give an opinion, you need to support it with	Opinion + Reason + Evidence!
This writer has an opinion, as well as a reason or two to support that opinion, but most reasons are stated without elaboration. She may have created a long list of reasons to support her opinion but does not say more about any one reason or pro- vide examples or evidence to support her reasons.	reasons! But opinion writers don't just stop with reasons. Today, I want to teach you that when writers come up with reasons to support an opinion, they then try to find evidence. One way to do this is by writing, "For example" and then giving an example to support the reason.	To give evidence, try using, "for example" and then providing information that supports your idea.
The writer uses some elaboration strate- gies some of the time.	One thing that you can do as a writer is to study your own best writ- ing—and then try to do that best writing on every page.	Study great writers: like YOU!!! What did I do on one page (in one part) that I can
This writer may elaborate on one page in his writ- ing. But the writer does not continue to elaborate and use what he knows in other parts of his book.	I say this because on this page, you used a very fancy technique to elaborate let me show you So what do you think you should be doing on this page? And this one?	do on every page (in every part?) Page 1: Page 2: Page 3: I compared two things!!!! Page 4:
The writer's piece lacks voice. This writer's piece sounds very formulaic. She doesn't yet really talk to the reader.	Right now, will you tell me a bit about this? What do you think? Oh and can you explain why you think that? You know what—one of the most important things that writers learn is that great writing sounds a lot like the writer is talking to the reader. Let me say back what you just said to me because these words are full of what people call voice. These are the words you should put onto the page when you write. Listen I'm telling you this because the way you wrote this book, and this one too, and this one, it feels like a machine could have written that. It doesn't sound like you. Would you work on making your writing sound more like you? The best way to do that is to do what you just did—say aloud what you want to write, and say it like you are talking to another person. Then put those words onto the paper.	At the top of each page, draw a face with a speech balloon coming out of the mouth to remind the writer to first say it to someone, trying to talk like she really cares about it. Remind the writer that you'll check to see if it ac- tually sounds like the writer (not a machine) wrote it when you read her writing.

The writer has provided evidence, usually in a one line summary statement. It would be a step forward for this writer to some- times write her evidence as a Small Moment story, or as a list.	I love that you are giving evidence to support your reasons. Like when you said, "Animal Planet is a great show because it teaches you things" and then you said, "I learned a lot about climbing a mountain in Alaska," that is great. You are giving evidence to support the fact that you learn from the show. But you know what? It would be even better if you wrote in a way so that we can almost feel like we were watching the show, and we were learning from it, too. You might say, "For example, in the how" and then tell a story about one thing that happened in the show and tell what you learned from it. That way we could really feel like your evidence is our evidence too.	When writing an opinion piece, you can support your ideas with: Stories, and tell what you learned from them Examples (write them with details.)
Language
The writer struggles with spelling. This writer's piece is riddled with spelling mis- takes. This does not necessarily mean the writing is not strong (in fact, the essay he wrote may be very strong), but the spelling mistakes compro- mise the reader's ability to understand it. The writer's struggle with spelling may stem from various causes—difficulty with understanding and applying spelling patterns, a limited stock of high-frequency words, lack of investment, the acquisition of English as a new language—and diagnosing the underlying problem will be an im- portant precursor to teaching into it.	When an opinion piece (or any piece of writing, really) is full of spell- ing mistakes, it can be hard for readers to understand what you are trying to say. Today, I want to remind you that writers try out multi- ple ways to spell a word before settling on one. Then, if they are still stuck, they consult a friend, writing partner, word wall, or other class- room resource.	<ul> <li>Writers work hard at their spelling. They:</li> <li>1. Try multiple versions of a word in the margin</li> <li>2. Pick the one that looks right</li> <li>3. Consult a peer, word wall, or other resource to help</li> </ul>

The writer struggles to write longer or "harder" words on the page. When the writer encounters something new or something that he needs to approximate, he freezes up. This writer might not feel comfortable writing words he doesn't already know. For instance, the writer may be stymied by writing the word delicious . The writer may stop writing or may write the word good instead.	Sometimes it seems to me that you are about to write really long and hard words, and then you start thinking, "Oh no, maybe I won't spell them right. Oh no, maybe I'll make a mistake, Oh no, Oh no." (I've meanwhile been shaking in my boots.) When you feel like you might chicken out because you are worried about making a mistake—say to yourself, "Stop it! Be Brave!" And then, even though you aren't sure, just try the best you can and keep going. That's the way to get the best writing onto the page. If you chicken out from writing big words, or from writing the little de- tails that can help a reader, or from trying to say something in a really beautiful way, your writing ends up just being so-so. The only way to make great writing is to be a brave writer. And to be a brave writer of long and hard words, you can think about each part of the word and think if you know other words that sound the same as that one. You can even try the same word a couple of times. Then you can pick the one that sounds the best and looks right.	Be BRAVE! Think about the parts of the word as you spell. pumpkin pump/kin Be BRAVE ! Pumpkin pumpkin pumpkin pumpkin pumpkin
The writer struggles with comma usage. This writer is attempting to form more complex sentences but is struggling with the process. It may be that she uses commas incorrectly, interspersing them throughout the piece with no apparent rhyme or reason, or that she simply doesn't use commas, resulting in long, difficult-to-read sentences. Either way, this writer needs help understanding how commas are used in sentences.	I've noticed that you've been trying to write longer, more complex sentences. Because of this, your writing sounds more like talking. It is quite beautiful. When writers write sentences that are more complex, though, they often need to use commas. Commas help readers know where to pause and help the sentence make sense. Today, I want to teach you a few important ways that writers use commas. Writers use commas in lists, and they also use them to separate two or more de- scriptive words.	Use commas To separate items in a list: • I want pears, apples, and oranges. To separate descriptive words: • He drove by in his red, shiny car.
The writer tends not to use specific and precise language as he writes about his opinions. This writer writes with generalizations. ("We need stuff because it is good. It is nice. It is great.")	I want to tell you something about your writing. You tend to write with big general words, and it is usually better to write with exact words. Like instead of saying, "Our coat closet is bad," it would be better to say it with exact words. "Our coat closet is" What?" Messy? A snarl of coats? It looks like people just throw things anywhere? You see how it is better to use exact words than big general words like, "It is bad." Try asking yourself, "What exactly do I want to say?" Think about one way to say it, then think about another way.	What EXACTLY do I want to say? What exactly do T want to say? (1) ··· (2) Think about one way then think about another way!

The Process of Generating Ideas
The writer struggles to generate meaning- ful topics worth exploring. This writer feels stuck and has difficulty generat- ing ideas for writing. Sometimes this manifests through avoidance behaviors (going to the bath- room, sharpening pencils), and other times the child simply seems to be in a constant state of "thinking," not writing. This child needs help not only with generating ideas, but also with learn- ing to independently use a repertoire of strategies when stuck.	I've noticed that coming up with ideas has been hard for you and that you've had to spend a lot of time thinking about what to write. When you write opinion pieces, you want them to be persuasive. And for them to be persuasive, you have to care a lot about the topic! It can help to think about what you really care the most about—think about things you love or hate and then see if you can write opin- ion pieces about that.	Write what you love, write what you hate. Not in between.
The Process of Drafting
The writer doesn't have a plan before he begins to write. This writer seems to pick up his or her pen, and write what he or she wants, and then is stymied. The writer might then start an ending to the piece, only to decide more needs to be said. This can lead to a piece that is chaotic, or that has a sequence of four endings.	One thing I notice about you is that when you write, you sit down at your desk, pick up your pen, and you get started. Lots of kids wait and wait and wait to think up an idea, but you don't wait. Ideas come to you right away, and that is great. But I want to teach you that when an idea comes to you, it is good to not get started writing but to instead spend some time getting ready. The way writers get ready is they plan what they are going to say so that before they write a word, they have a whole lot of ideas for what will go at the beginning of the piece, and in the middle I think it would help you plan your opinion pieces if you did some drawings before you start writing—planning drawings. Maybe you could try starting with a drawing of the problem, then one or two drawings of what you think people could do, step one and step two, to fix the problem, and then a drawing of what things will be like when they are fixed up. So today you are writing about the park being messy—what will go in the first drawing, the drawing about the problem? Ok—so beau- tiful birds and flowers and then garbage. Will you put some details in—like show a daffodil with a paper cup smushed right on it? Great! Then that drawing will help you plan out about six things you can say about the problem!	A Post-it that helps remind him how to get words down on the page. You may write, "Use your plan." There may be an icon of a page of writing with picture space and writing space. There should be an arrow pointing to the picture space for the writer to use to help add to his words.

The Process of Revision
The writer fills the pages as she drafts and only writes to the bottom of the page when she revises. This writer tends to push herself while she drafts to write to the end of the page. The writer, there- fore, sometimes feels like she cannot or does not need to revise because there is not enough space.	It seems like you get to the end of the page, when you are writing, and you stop there. But lots of times, I am pretty sure you have more to say—but you aren't going to page two, or adding on a flap at the ending. After this, will you remember that writers write as much as they have to say and they make their books longer, their pages longer, so they can say everything? They ask themselves, "Do I have more to say?" And if have more to say, they find the space. They make the space. Whenever you want to add more, you can think, "Should I add a flap or a whole new page?" And then just tape or staple it in!	Extra flaps and strips to use and add onto her page. To help the writer to remember to use these tools again the next day, you may tuck a few into her writing folder. This way, as she is trying to add more, she will have a few flaps ready to add on. You may leave a Post-it that reminds her to add on to her writing. It may say, "Revise" at the top, and underneath it may say, "Add on information, examples, and reasons."
The writer tends to have a limited reper- toire of elaboration strategies. This writer elaborates by adding on to his piece with the same strategy, rather than using a few ways to say and add more.	I notice that you elaborate by (strategy the writer is using) in your opin- ion books, and that is great. BUT writers try to write with a variety of stuff. So I wanted to remind you that opinion writers also say more by adding in these things: Tips on how to do something Suggestions on the best ways to do something Warnings about what could go wrong Stories of other people who have done this Encouragement to do this Let's reread your piece and think about which ones we can add.	If you made a whole-class chart on ways to elaborate in opinion writing, you could make a mini-version of that chart for the child's writing folder, or you could turn that chart into a checklist.
The writer tends to give information and reasons that are not connected to her orig- inal opinion. This writer often starts with an opinion and in the middle of the piece may find herself writing about something else or giving information that doesn't help the reader understand or believe in her opinion.	Writers reread their writing and revise their pieces to make sure that the details and information they are giving fit with their opinions. One way you can check for this is you can reread your piece and ask yourself, "Do the information and reasons go with my opinion?" If they don't, you can cross them out.	A chart that on one side says, "Fits with my infor- mation." and on the other side says, "Does not fit with my information."

The Process of Editing
The writer edits for one thing but not for others. This writer may edit her work but only tries to fix her spelling. She may not reread to fix her punctuation.	When writers edit, there are many things that they look for and try to fix. You can use a checklist to help you think about editing for many things. You may want to reread your piece a few times, looking for different things each time.	Reread and Edit! • Spelling • Punctuation • Capitals Reread and Edit Free day repearses Copitals! Puncuation! Puncuation!
The writer only uses or knows one way to edit her spelling. This writer may feel like she has edited her spell- ing, even if few words are actually fixed. This may be because she does not have or use a repertoire of ways to work on spelling. For example, she may only check her piece for word wall words. She may not try out multisyllabic words in differ- ent ways to help get a closer approximation or the correct spelling.	Young writers use more than one strategy to spell. As you are spelling a word, you can try to think about what is the best way to spell this word—the word wall, trying to write and rewrite the word a few times, or looking it up in a resource in the room.	Try Different Spellings:         1.         2.         3.
